While in San Francisco on a recent review of a dispensary, I happened to come across a new Norcal strain known as Ingrid. It's common to come across great cannabis on my ventures, but to come across genetically superior strains is rare. At first glance you can tell this is a rare breed. The buds body is dense, packed with kief beyond belief and is bursting with short, stocky, orange hairs. The aroma is a combination of California cheese and Yosemite, yet it quietly boast a slight hint of tropical fruit. The effects are smooth and feature exactly what most cannabis consumers desire such as numbness from pain, relief from stress while surprisingly remaining energetic and full of creativity without any noticeable signs of drowsiness once the effects begin to ware off. I can tell you that I found it at Good Fellows Smoke Shop, Sanctuary, and Grass Roots but can't guarantee that they'll always have it in stock or if other Norcal or Socal dispensaries might have access to it now, but i can guarantee that its pretty exclusive so if you come across a batch, be sure to grab a bag, you'll be lucky you did. Your gonna love the way you feel, I guarantee it.
